

ABSTRACT

The present invention relates to a method of assaying for Alzheimer's disease in a human by determining the relative abundance of one or more forms of amyloid precursor protein (APP) or the enzyme responsible for said forms in circulatory fluid and to a method for treating the disease by modulating divalent cation, trivalent cation and/or heparin interaction with APP.

Sub A4